"But even more conservative were the fishermen, intent upon their floats, who let us go by without a glance. They were indifferent, like pieces of dead nature. They did not move any more than if they had been fishing in an old Dutch print. You might have trepanned every one of their innocent heads and found no more than so much coiled fishing line below their skulls. . . . I do dearly love the class of man who plies his unfruitful art forever and a day by still and depopulated waters."

And again he observes of these French fishermen:

"They seemed stupefied with contentment; and when we induced them to exchange a few words with us about the weather their voices sounded quiet and far away."

"An angler is an important piece of river scenery; and his quiet presence serves to accentuate the solitude and stillness and remind you of the glittering citizens below your boat."
